WELCOME TO OUR DOWNTOWN CLEVELAND NEIGHBORHOOD ...

Most neighborhoods are located at the intersection of streets. Our neighborhood sits at the intersection of interests. At the intersection of arts and athletics, entertainment and adventure, dining and relaxation. Ours is as downtown oasis of activity where avenues for entertainment both meet and lead in every direction imaginable.

Sheriff Street and Central Market, now East 4th and Fieldhouse.

It's been that way since the early days. Destined to be a district built around entertaining people. In the 1875, visitors came to the neighborhood's opulent Euclid Avenue Opera House and, later, the legendary White Elephant to experience live shows or rifle battalion demonstrations or to enjoy amusements like billiards, bowling, and shooting galleries. It was a gateway to entertainment.

*Euclid Avenue Opera House under construction early 1870s.
Demolished in 1922 and now the East 4th Dining District.*

And while these storied structures would give way to other buildings and the shapes and names of streets would change over time, the fun and excitement did not end. In their footprints arose Jacobs Field and the Gund Arena – their own names changing with the march of time. And in those same spots, now as then, Rocket Arena and Progressive Field are where both championships are won and hearts are broken. But win or lose, on the field or the court, the players always put on a show. And the fans, whether rooting for home or away, always have a performance to remember.

Public Square, 1895. It's original 18th century New England style layout visible then and as it is still preserved today.

And there is more still. Behind the scenes of the stage and beyond stadium lights. There's a quieter side to the neighborhood – a gathering place that traces its origins to Moses Cleaveland's (yes, that is the spelling) original 1790 plan for the city – Public Square. This serene and green space in the heart of the city have seen history made – in 1879, it became the first street in the world lit with electric lights. Now as then, it remains a popular gathering place, hosting hundreds of events a year from charity rallies to food truck days.

Today, theatre-loving sports fans or foodies looking for a stroll and a laugh can all find what they're seeking in our unique part of the city of Cleveland. Whatever it is that interests you, it can be found here, because all forms of entertainment intersect in our neighborhood.
